Redox activity of gold nanoparticles: influence of particle size and surface modification. A unique feature of the oxidation-reduction reactions of gold nanoparticles (GNPs) is the ability of GNPs to show visible color change due to electron transfer of the oxidized GNPs to the reduced GNPs or vice versa. In this paper, we focus on the color reaction of GNPs for evaluating their redox activity at the single nanoparticle level. For this purpose, we compared the color change of GNPs due to the oxidation-reduction reaction with those of Pd and Au colloids. The spectral colors of the GNPs are blue and pink for the reduction and oxidation, respectively, in contrast to the Pd and Au colloids which exhibit red and yellow-brown colors, respectively. We also examined the influence of the particle size of GNPs on their redox activity. The effect of the particle size is significant, and the color change of the GNPs is significantly weaker for smaller GNPs (0.6-4.0 nm) than for larger GNPs (6.0-20.0 nm). In order to suppress the oxidation of the gold nanoparticles by the adsorbed oxygen molecules, GNPs were coated with silica (SiO₂). The as-synthesized SiO₂-coated GNPs were stable and showed a remarkable redox activity. When the GNPs were loaded with a dye (indocyanine green, ICG) through the silica coating, ICG exhibited an intense red-purple color that is completely reversible upon the addition of hydrogen peroxide. This study provides a useful method to evaluate the redox activity of GNPs in colorimetric sensors and for biomedical applications. [Artificial caries model analysis of caries-preventive measures]. To analyze and evaluate the difference of the effects of fluoride, fluoride remineralization and restoration techniques on artificial caries model prepared by using non-erosive acid gelation. A total of 150 non-carious enamel blocks (10 mm x 10 mm) were randomly divided into six groups. Non-carious enamel blocks of group 1 were immediately immersed into a non-erosive 10% citric acid gelation solution and stored in artificial saliva (S); group 2, 3 and 4 were immersed into gel
