You take the gamble on a level-headed, quiet veteran who in the modern context would be considered an "old head" (though with his being a 30-something not exactly a young head, particularly when he's in his mid-40's) - someone who in the context of today's NFL wouldn't be considered flashy or noted as a strong character, but someone who through his career has proven himself to be consistent and reliable. He's also not having an outstanding season at all, and the Rams have been a team relying on consistent play from their quarterbacks - it might just be too hard to get away from by default. 8: Cleveland Browns Cleveland may have quarterback-turned-running back Johnny Manziel in the starting rotation, but one of the three starters going into Week 11 is still Robert Griffin III. Griffin has been as bad as some of the league's worst quarterbacks this season. The stats are there - he's had a passer rating of under 50.0 in seven of the Browns' eight games (though they're a pretty solid team overall). His downfield accuracy has been particularly poor, with only 35.2 percent of his passes heading yards or more, down from 50.0 last year - but he has still been among the most inaccurate quarterbacks in the league (or rather, the ones playing poorly enough that anything besides complete inaccuracy of passes is still better than what RG3 has). Griffin has also been a turnover machine, throwing seven interceptions on the year - that's tied for the most in the league. His inability to throw the ball away despite having the most interceptions is just one reason you don't want a quarterback throwing the ball repeatedly, and the Browns are expecting even worse numbers in the second half of the season. But you're a desperate NFL team, and Griffin is
