We studied changes in left ventricular end-systolic pressure-length relations after in vivo administration of a beta-adrenergic agonist, dobutamine, to increase heart rate and contractility in 9 closed-chest, anaesthetized, volume-loaded dogs. Ventricular volumes were measured by the sonomicrometric method and left ventricular end-systolic pressure by the thermodilution technique. Dobutamine reduced heart rate from 110 to 50 beats per minute, and end-systolic volume from 20 +/- 3 to 19 +/- 3 ml. Load increased the slope and maximal negative dP/dL, but not the length at which dP/dL = 0. There was a weak correlation between the maximum negative dP/dL and the left ventricular end-systolic pressure-volume relation (r = 0.36, p less than 0.05). The maximal negative dP/dL and end-systolic pressure-volume relation increased by a similar magnitude. We
