There is often a need to transmit data via a low-bandwidth, highly intermittent communication channel. For example, there may be a need to transmit data from a mobile station to a base station of a cellular telephone network. This typically requires a continuous radio link between the mobile station and the base station. Because of variations in radio propagation conditions, the radio link may be intermittent, possibly lasting only a few milliseconds. This may lead to problems in synchronizing data on the radio link. The cellular telephone industry adopted the cdma2000 standard, which specifies a communication protocol for such a cellular system. In the cdma2000 standard, data to be transmitted is encoded, interleaved and spread by a pseudonoise code to form a transmission signal. The transmission signal is transmitted and received by a receiver using a forward link. A receiver decodes the received signal and a demodulator recovers the data from the demodulated signal. Each transmission signal includes a pilot signal for measuring the quality of the transmission channel. The quality of the transmission channel is continuously measured and reported to the base station. Based on the quality of the transmission channel, the base station adaptively determines if the quality is sufficient to support the radio link between the base station and the mobile station. If the quality is low, the base station instructs the mobile station to retransmit the transmission signal on the forward link. Otherwise, no retransmission is necessary. The cdma2000 standard also allows each transmission signal to include control data. The control data includes, for example, data used for mobile station specific functions, such as for call setup and for command recognition from the base station. The control data is also used by the receiver to detect transmission signals intended for the mobile station. Communication of the control data in the transmission signal requires complex encoding and de-encoding processes. For example, the control data includes a message that is encoded and spread by a pseudonoise code. The encoded and spread control data is interleaved and transmitted in the transmission signal. The CDMA receiver processes the control data in the received signal by using the pseudonoise code to decode the control data. Once decoded, the message is then de-interleaved and further processed. These processes increase the complexity of the CDMA receiver and reduce the performance of the CDMA receiver.The purpose of this study is to describe the safety and efficacy of Romiplostim (Nplate) to reverse the medical complications of ITP in children and adolescents.
