In order to find out the relationship between serum bilirubin concentration, biliary gallbladder ejection fraction, and hepatobiliary perfusion, a new scintigraphic method (scintiplanar single photon emission computed tomography) was used. Fourteen adult subjects with jaundice were enrolled in the study. All had elevated serum bilirubin level and normal value of the hepatobiliary perfusion. The single photon emission computed tomography revealed in all cases more hepatic, than biliary, activity. The differences between hepatic and biliary activity were not statistically significant, and the former may be explained by the presence of the gallbladder activity. The biliary ejection fraction values were scattered around the mean value, and they had no correlation with the bilirubin levels. These findings indicate that in jaundice the single photon emission computed tomography may show a greater activity of the liver than of the gallbladder. The biliary ejection fraction is unrelated to the serum bilirubin concentration.Angry Birds: BB Egg Battle
